Market comment

The energy sector decreased by 3.9% over the month, with Crude Oil (WTI) declining the most (-7.0%). Oil prices broke out of the tight range persisting since late 2016, mainly driven by bearish inventory data from the US, which are still going against OPEC and non-OPEC members' efforts to reduce the global supply excess. Overall, energy is down 9.7% YTD and the worst performing sector across the asset class.

As to the Industrial Metals sector, it dropped by 1.0% with many discrepancies between the markets: lead was the best performing metal with a rise of 3.5%, while nickel was the worst with a decline of 8.9%. Industrial Metals prices weakened following President Donald Trump's failure to revoke the Affordable Care Act, leaving a doubt on his ability to conduct tax reforms and infrastructure spending. Moreover, China lowered its growth expectation to 6.5%, which triggered demand concerns from the biggest metals consumer in the world.

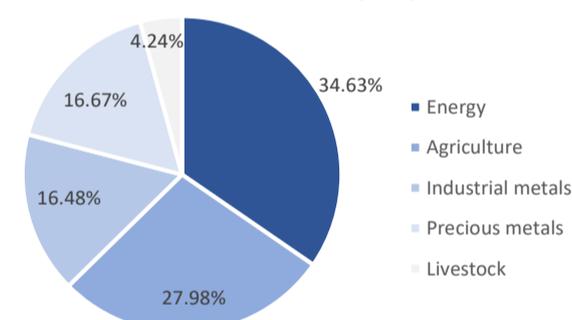

Precious metals declined by 0.57%, reaching 8.7% YTD. Both gold (-0.49%) and silver (-1.2%) reversed their rising trends from the last two months and moved lower in March. On one hand, the expectation of an interest hike by the Federal Reserve reduced the demand for non-interest-bearing assets like gold. On the other hand, seasonal demand from India (Akshaya Tritiya festival) and slowing impact of demonetisation had supported prices.

Lastly, the grain sector dropped by 5.1% in March. All markets declined with corn (-2.8%) being the best performing market and Kansas wheat (-9.3%) the worst. Corn prices were slightly lower, due to higher than expected harvest from Brazil and South Africa and high estimates of production from India and Argentina. Soybean plunged by 8.7% over expectations of increased supplies from South America and high harvest from Brazil.
